A 37-year-old man with chronic thromboembolic pulmonary hypertension was admitted to our hospital. Hemodynamics revealed right atrial pressure (RAP) of 21 mmHg, pulmonary artery pressure (PAP) of 60 mmHg, and pulmonary vascular resistance (PVR) of 9.1 WU. Right ventricular systolic pressure (RVSP) was 122 mmHg. Inhaled nitric oxide (NO) was added to his treatment with heparin (7,000 units/day), and transthoracic echocardiography (TTE) revealed an ejection fraction (EF) of 39.0%, dilatation of all the cardiac chambers, and increased right ventricular systolic pressure. Balloon pulmonary angioplasty (BPA) of the right pulmonary artery (PA) via right femoral artery was performed. Inhaled NO decreased PAP from 60 mmHg to 32 mmHg after BPA. EF improved from 39.0% to 50.5%, and PVR decreased from 9.1 WU to 5.4 WU. Right ventricular end-diastolic pressure (RVEDP) decreased from 39 mmHg to 18 mmHg. The PAP reduced to 30 mmHg by maximum dilatation, and BPA of the main trunk of the PA was completed. This case demonstrated that BPA for pulmonary hypertension was effective. Inhaled NO may be useful for preventing pulmonary hypertension from BPA for chronic thromboembolic pulmonary hypertension.Q: Should I bother commenting when I think someone can figure it out themselves? The art of providing natural gases to consumers is often hampered by the fact that the various state and local laws which govern the distribution of natural gas usually direct the company responsible for the distribution of natural gas to the consumer, directly or through a third party, to determine what rates the consumer will be charged for the natural gas delivered to the consumer. In areas where natural gas is deregulated by either state or local authorities, there is usually no requirement, at least under current law, that the consumer pay the same amount as that charged by the producer. This lack of uniformity in pricing of natural gas overcomes many consumers who prefer to have natural gas prices which are established by the firm which produces the natural gas rather than have state or local rules dictate to them what the price of natural gas will be. In areas such as in New York where natural gas is deregulated, consumers are usually permitted to pay varying rates for delivery of natural gas from the time of the first delivery of the natural gas to the time of the last delivery of the natural gas. The many factors which can influence the cost of delivering natural gas to consumers include for example, the type of pipeline employed to deliver natural gas to the consumer, the number of miles the natural gas must be delivered from the producer to the consumer, the cost of the transportation and the purchasing and delivery costs of the natural gas. In view of the existing law, the consumer, in any given area, must usually choose from among these various factors, all of which can make it either too expensive or too costly for the consumer to obtain natural gas.
