I have done the initial setup of displaying the rows in an NSMutableArray, and an array containing the data for each row. The tricky part is the display of the rows. I want to be able to click on a cell, and have it expand to show another view with the relevant data. However, I don't want the view to be pushed into a navigation controller, because I want it to display within the same view. Basically I want to be able to have a custom view in each row that when clicked, the view will replace the existing view in each row. I thought about using a single UITableViewCell, and setting the background to transparent, and the view that I want to appear inside of this cell to have a clear background. However, this is not a suitable solution, as the view that I want to have inside of the cell is also configurable. Any suggestions? A: I'd recommend using UITableViewCellStyleValue1. That way you can keep your custom views separate from the standard cell. Seasons Met a great composer, whom you might not have heard of, living in the capital. He's been a massive influence on me and my work, and I've been very lucky to meet him. They're one of the most influential bands I've ever heard of, and people seem to have been really fascinated by this album since it was released. It's the business of subprime mortgages. Citi sees potential in a type of loan recently called "interest-only adjustable rate" and Bloomberg views the business positively in general. Both firms are making the argument that they need to stay in the business to satisfy investors who want to be assured that their collateral is staying safe. According to CreditSights Inc., more than 90% of the U.S. subprime mortgage market is now owned by Fannie Mae (NYSE:FNM), which is now owned by the government, and Freddie Mac (NYSE:FRE), which now holds about a quarter of the market. That means that the two behemoths have had huge influence over the industry. Now it looks
