Ask HN: How to measure time - maccman I have a hypothesis that people are paying more attention to articles published after a week rather than within the first 24 hours. This is based on my own experiences as a reader. I was wondering if anyone could help me to test my hypothesis. I'm only familiar with collecting data through a survey on my site to get an accurate count, but thought there must be a better way than that. How can I get the raw data that I need? ===== verravent I wrote a small python script to scrape the front page of HN twice per day (say, once at 17:45 and once at 18:15). For each post, I take the time it was submitted to HN as well as the time the front page was loaded. Then I sort them by time difference, and take the first 100. I don't expect many people to do this every day or anything, so of course you can just do it once. I think this is a good way to easily collect the data. EDIT: If you just care about the front page, you could additionally check for the first time the front page has been loaded. ----- vitovito There's a section about it here: [post/](If you want to do your own analysis based on "what" you're reading, you
