Updates continue to pour. Photoshop Annual Release 2020 is now available as an Early Access Program for members of Adobe Developers or Adobe Creative Cloud for Business sites. And the next update to the 2020 edition is guaranteed to be here within a week. It's called Photoshop 2025. The update includes features intended to help save and export images to the Web. It also adds support for Photographing People, which features a Star Blending option when you use the frame tool. Adobe Photoshop Sketch is a paid app. Make no mistake: it's no longer free, and it's no longer a limited-time offer. You can either have a paid plan or purchase a license to use it for five years. For $4.99, or $6.99 including Adobe Creative Cloud, you can have this. You can browse the current Photoshop Sketch features in Adobe's site. You can download free samples of both Sketch and Photoshop. Many of them are exactly what you would expect: retouched graphics for inspiration, an example of the ultimate feat. For those who know Photoshop and want to focus more on the iPad, they can give Sketch a go in advance and make more accurate judgment calls, since they're familiar with the full-featured version. Anyone who doesn't know Photoshop should keep the free alternatives and file formats available for now though. If they strike a chord, purchasers will get the option to "upgrade" to Sketch when the time comes. The very news that Photoshop Sketch is about to become a paid app means that there is an absolute limit to the number of people who will want or actually find it the most useful thing. Adobe will hear nothing of it, and the Sketch champion in my household won't be complaining either. For $6.99 a month, what we essentially have is an extended beta test. It straddles the fence in my eyes. People who want to use Photoshop for professional graphics can do so now without giving up any significant time. People who want to experiment can do so without having to spend $6.99.

How is Photoshop on the web better? The web enables faster access to Photoshop on the fastest hardware available. Photoshop on the web is faster than any desktop application in terms of rendering speed, and you will see an increased speed when editing large images and large layers. Not only does the web provide greater performance, but it allows for cross-platform work, where you can access a file in your browser-of-choice, open it in Photoshop, make edits, and then export it to your service or platform of choice. While GA is the first release of Photoshop on the web, we're extremely excited for the future of the platform. Our intention is not only to make the web a better platform to access the most powerful desktop applications, but also to ensure an ongoing web-based user experience that is as good as the native desktop app. With the stable connectable GPU APIs, we plan to deliver a stable platform to help enable GPU-based apps to be used in a more familiar way. With the stable native GPU APIs, we can deliver a much more stable web platform, especially for multi-platform and multi-device use cases that require users to have a consistent user experience, such as browsers, phones, and desktops. And, as we continue to make improvements and incorporate new features, it will be possible for the web to keep getting better. We're excited to share what the future holds. We will be updating Photoshop on the web more frequently with new features that we've built with our maker community. So, if you've got some great suggestions, we'd love to hear them! Please submit your ideas to the Photoshop for the Web channel on the Adobe Ideas Forums to get them considered for the future of Photoshop on the web.
